† Salve, v.[2] Obs. [app. ad. L. salvāre to SAVE.

In the astronomical sense 1, the L. form was prob. adopted because the vernacular save did not sufficiently indicate the technical import of the word. In this use the word became virtually equivalent to 'solve', 'explain', and it seems probable that sense 2 (though in our quots. appearing earlier) arose as a generalized application of this notion. The remaining uses were no doubt suggested by mod. Latin phrases like salvo jure, salvo honore, etc.; see SALVO sb.[1]

1. Astr. To SAVE (the appearances, the phenomena), i. e. to frame a hypothesis which will account for all the observed facts of the apparent motions of the heavenly bodies. Hence gen., to account for, explain by hypothesis. (Cf. SOLVE v., used in the same phrases.)

The ordinary adjectival and pronominal designation of identity, equivalent to the older ILK a.[1], to L. idem, Gr. ὁ αὐτός, Ger. derselbe. Normally preceded by the, exc. after a demonstrative; the omission of the article occurs only in dialectal or vulgar speech and in certain specially elliptical varieties of diction (e. g. in commercial correspondence). As the prefixed article is functionally a part of the word, it is often difficult to distinguish the simple predicative use (= 'identical') from the absolute and elliptical uses.

A. adj.

I. Not numerically different from an object indicated or implied; identical.

1. With forward reference: Identical with what is indicated in the following context.

It is remarkable that this use is all but entirely absent from the writings of Shakspere; the only clear instance appears to be quot. 1598 in 4 below

a. Followed by a clause with relative pronoun (that, who, which) or relative adverb (when, where). Cf. VERY a.

In this construction that sometimes has not the strict pronominal syntax, but is equivalent in meaning to 'in (on, by, etc.) which', 'where', 'when'. Cf. the similar use of F. que.

3. Expressing the identity of an object designated by different names, standing in different relations, or related to different subjects or objects. In this use the sb. qualified by same often denotes an indeterminate or hypothetical object, so that the becomes (with a sing.) functionally equivalent to the indefinite article, or (with a plural) redundant; hence result occasional ambiguities.

Cf. the Fr. 'Deux mots qui signifient une même chose', 'De mêmes causes doivent produire de mêmes effets' with the ambiguous English 'Two words which signify the same thing', 'The same causes must produce the same effects'.

3. Ethics. A consideration which operates to enforce obedience to any law or rule of conduct; a recognized motive for conformity to moral or religious law, operating either through the agent's desire for some resultant good or through his fear of some resultant evil.

As a technical term of Ethics, the word is favoured by the Utilitarians. For the classification of the different 'sanctions' see quots. 1780 and 1887. The sanction of law in the strict sense (see 2 above) is distinguished as 'legal' or 'political'. Bentham's 'moral sanction' corresponds to the 'social sanction' of other writers.

e. To weigh (or examine) with the weights (or scales) of the sanctuary: to test by the standard of divine revelation. Also, to examine by an equal and just scale (see 1728), after F. peser une chose au poids du sanctuaire, dans la balance du sanctuaire (Littré).

Suggested by Vulg. ad (or juxta) pondus sanctuarii, pondere sanctuarii Lev. v. 15, Num. vii. 13, 19, 25, 31, 37, xviii. 16. The force of the orig. Heb. expression would be more accurately rendered by 'according to the sacred shekel'.

1617 MORYSON Itin. III. 43 Setting humane experience aside, we will waigh this by the holy scales of the Sanctuarie. 1728 CHAMBERS Cycl. s.v., To...examine a Thing by the Weight of the Sanctuary, is to examine it by a just and equal Scale.

2. A specially holy place within a temple or church. a. In the Mosaic tabernacle and the Jewish temple: The HOLY PLACE, including the 'Holy of holies' (see HOLY sb. 5); sometimes applied to the latter only.

†Sanctuary (or sanctuaries) of the sanctuary: a literal rendering of the Vulg. sanctuarium (-aria) sanctuarii, which inaccurately represents the Heb. for 'Holy of holies'.

II. 5. A church or other sacred place in which, by the law of the mediæval church, a fugitive from justice, or a debtor, was entitled to immunity from arrest. Hence, in wider sense, applied to any place in which by law or established custom a similar immunity is secured to fugitives.

By English common law, a fugitive charged with any offence but sacrilege and treason might escape punishment by taking refuge in a sanctuary, and within forty days confessing his crime and taking an oath which subjected him to perpetual banishment. By the act 21 Jac. I. c. 28 § 7 (1625) the right of sanctuary in criminal cases was abolished. Certain places, chiefly actual or reputed precincts of former royal palaces, as Whitefriars, the Savoy, and the Mint, continued to be sanctuaries in civil cases until their privilege was abolished by the acts 8 & 9 Will. III. c. 27 § 15 (1696-7) and 9 Geo. I. c. 28 (1722). The abbey of Holyrood is still by law a sanctuary for debtors, but the abolition of imprisonment for debt has rendered the privilege useless.

‖ Saros (sēə·rɒs). [Gr. σάρος or σαρός (Berossos), a. Assyro-Babylonian šār(u.)]

1. Antiq. The Babylonian name for the number 3600, and hence for a period of 3600 years.

The notion expressed in quot. 1662, that the saros consisted of 3600 days, is due to the desire to rationalize the incredible statements of Berossos with regard to the lengths of the reigns of the antediluvian kings of Babylon. Other expedients for the same purpose were adopted by early writers on chronology.

2. Astr. Adopted by modern astronomers as the name of the cycle of 18 years and 10⅓ days, in which solar and lunar eclipses repeat themselves.

This use is founded on the statement of Suidas (app. due to some mistake) that the length of the saros was 18½ years.

It is doubtful whether the Sp. word is a transferred application (which, indeed, would be difficult to account for) of a Sp. representation of L. saxifraga SAXIFRAGE, or whether it was adopted from some American language; in the latter case the American word seems to have influenced the form of the Sp. name for saxifrage, which according to the native lexicographers has the forms saxifraga, fragia, fragua, salsifragia, salsifrex, saxafras. The Spanish writer Monardes (1571) regards the Sp. name as adopted from Fr., which seems unlikely; he gives the native Indian name as panaume.]

Satan (sē·tăn). Also 3–5 saton, 5 satone; 3–7 sathan, 4, 6 sathane, 5 sathon(e. [a. L. Sātān (Vulg., only in the O. T.) = Gr. Σατάν or Σατᾶν (once in the LXX and once in the N. T.), a. Heb. שָׂטָן śāṭān adversary, one who plots against another, f. śāṭan to oppose, plot against.

In the Old Testament the Heb. word ordinarily denotes a human adversary, but in some of the later portions (Job, Chron., Zech., Ps. cix) it occurs (chiefly with definite article) as the designation of an angelic being hostile to mankind, who tempts men to evil and accuses them to God. In both applications the ordinary rendering of the LXX is διάβολος slanderer (see DEVIL sb.); the more accurate ἐπίβουλος (plotter) occurs once; the one instance in which the Heb. word is retained (1 Kings xi. 14) relates clearly to a human enemy, but may have been misapprehended. In the Gr. N. T. the ordinary form is Σατανᾶς (once only Σατᾶν), which is followed by the Vulgate and hence by Wyclif (see SATANAS); but the English versions from Tindale onwards (including the Rheims N. T.) all substitute the Heb. form Satan. Cf. OF. Sathan, Satan, Fr., Sp., It., G. Satan.

The pronunciation (sē·tăn), which is mentioned disapprovingly by Walker (1828), and is ignored in later Dictionaries, is still not uncommon in British liturgical and pulpit use.]

Satire (sæ·təiəɹ). Also 6–8 satyre, 7–8 satyr, 8 satir. [a. F. satire (= Sp. sátira, Pg., It. satira, G. satire), or directly ad. L. satira, later form of satura, in early use a discursive composition in verse treating of a variety of subjects, in classical use a poem in which prevalent follies or vices are assailed with ridicule or with serious denunciation. The word is a specific application of satura medley; this general sense appears in the phrase per saturam in the lump, indiscriminately; according to the grammarians this is elliptical for lanx satura (lit. 'full dish': lanx dish, satura, fem. of satur full, related to satis enough), which is alleged to have been used for a dish containing various kinds of fruit, and for food composed of many different ingredients.

Formerly often confused or associated with Satyr (see esp. sense 4), from the common notion (found already in some ancient grammarians) that L. satira was derived from the Gr. σάτυρος satyr, in allusion to the chorus of satyrs which gave its name to the Greek 'satyric' drama. The words satire and satyr were probably at one time pronounced alike, as the derivatives satiric and satyric are still; and the common use of y and i as interchangeable symbols in the 16th and 17th c. still further contributed to the confusion.]

I. 1. A poem, or in modern use sometimes a prose composition, in which prevailing vices or follies are held up to ridicule. Sometimes, less correctly, applied to a composition in verse or prose intended to ridicule a particular person or class of persons, a lampoon.

Also used Hist. as the rendering of L. satura in its pre-classical sense of a poetic 'medley': see the etymological note above.

1. Myth. One of a class of woodland gods or demons, in form partly human and partly bestial, supposed to be the companions of Bacchus.

In Greek art of the pre-Roman period the satyr was represented with the ears and tail of a horse. Roman sculptors assimilated it in some degree to the faun of their native mythology, giving to it the ears, tail, and legs of a goat, and budding horns.

In the English Bible the word is applied (without precedent either in the LXX or the Vulgate) to the hairy dæmons or monsters (Heb. śe'îrîm) of Semitic superstition, supposed to inhabit deserts.

Number of illustrative quotations	735	698	1393	192	14204

* Including the Supplement of 1902.

The number of quotations in the corresponding portion of Richardson is 719.

The words here included are for the most part of Romanic origin. A few native Old English words (say vb.[1], saw sb.[1] and sb.[2], and three or four more) occur in the first few pages, but none are found among the words beginning with sc-, because the OE. sc- is represented in modern English by sh-. Of Scandinavian origin are scale sb.[1], scant, scar, scare, scathe, score, scot, and perhaps scour vb.[1] There is a considerable number of derivatives from Greek, especially under Sch- and Scl-. With the initial combination sch- there are many adaptions from Dutch, German, and Italian. From the Celtic languages there are only the little-known scallag, scollop sb.[2], scoloc. In striking contrast to the previous instalment of S, this section contains barely two or three words from Oriental and one (savannah) from American languages.

In this section the absence of long articles is somewhat remarkable, the longest, that on say vb.[1], filling only 11 columns, an unusually small space for an important native verb. The sense-development of many of the words, however, though not so diversified as to require to be treated at great length, is not wanting in interest: see, e.g., save vb. and prep., scab, scaffold, scale sb.[1], sb.[2], sb.[3], scalp, scan vb., scandal, scantling, scavenger, scene, sceptic, schedule, scheme, schism, scholar, school, science, scold, scope, score, scour vb.[1] The varying relation in use between the three synonymous and etymologically identical adjs. Scotch, Scots, and Scottish is curiously illustrated in our quotations.

Of the etymological notes, perhaps the most important is that on the word scientific, the true history of which has not hitherto been given in any English dictionary. New etymological facts or suggestions will also be found under savannah, scold, scone, scoop, scorn, scour vb.[1] and vb.[2]

Saunter (sɔ̄'ntəɹ), v. Also 5–8 santer, (7 sawnter, dial. sonter). [Of obscure origin.

The current suggestion that the word is a. AF. saunterer (= s'aunterer), to venture oneself, is unlikely (apart from difficulties of meaning) on the ground that the AF. word, of which only one instance has been found (1338 in Yearbks. Trinity 12 Edw. III, p. 619) is app. an adoption of ME. aunture to ADVENTURE, and possibly a mere nonce-word; the conjecture that it represents a med.L. type 'exadventūrare is phonologically inadmissible.]

The interpretation 'loitering, vagrancy' does not well suit the context, and the corresponding sense of the vb. has not been found before the middle of the 17th c. If SAUNTRELL means 'pretended saint', sauntering may be a back formation from it, with the sense 'a pretending to holiness'.

1. In the original use, a quantity of finely chopped pork, beef, or other meat, spiced and flavoured, enclosed in a short length of the intestine of some animal, so as to form a cylindrical roll (usually, one of the 'links' formed by tying the containing intestine at regular intervals); later also, in generalized sense, meat thus prepared. In the 19th c. the application of the word has been greatly extended; in its widest use, it denotes a preparation of comminuted beef, veal, pork, mutton, or a mixture of these, either fresh, salted, pickled, smoked or cured, with salt, spices, flour (sometimes with the addition of fats, blood, sugar, vegetables, etc.), stuffed into a container made from an intestine, stomach, bladder, or other animal tissue.

There are more than 150 kinds of sausage, distinguished by names indicating the ingredients and the method of manufacture. They are divided into two classes, in the U. S. known as dry sausage, which is a cured product, subjected to a process of drying lasting several weeks, and fresh or wet sausage.

Save (sēiv), quasi-prep. and conj. Forms: a. 3–5 sauf, 5–6 saufe, 5 sawf, sauff, saauf; 3–5 saf, 4–5 safe, saaf, 4–6 saff(e, 5 sef; 5–6 salf, 6 salfe, saulfe; 5–6 Sc. saif(f. β. 3–4 sauve, 4 sawve, 5 sawe, 4–6 salve, 4– save. [Developed from SAFE a. 5, in imitation of the similar development in the use of the equivalent F. sauf.

Already in OF. the adj. sauf, fem. sauve, prefixed to a sb. in the absolute construction (= L. salvō, salvā: see SAFE a. 5) had often the sense 'being excepted', so that it became (like the analogous except ppl. adj. in Eng.) functionally equivalent to a prep., and was eventually treated as such, the masc. form sauf being used even before a fem. sb. Cf. Sp. salvo, Pr. sal.

The β forms may partly represent the OF. sauve in collocation with a fem. sb., and partly the ME. form of the plural adj. But the later exclusive use of the form save is probably due to the identification of the word with the imperative of the vb.: cf. except, which appears to have been similarly apprehended as an imperative.

The use of a nominative after save (see 1 b) may perhaps be a trace of the originally adjectival character of the word; it is, however, to be noted that the same thing occurs with all the quasi-prepositional words of the same meaning, including even saving and excepting, which are in origin pr. ppples. of transitive verbs.]

OE. seax (:—sahso-) knife, SAX, f. pre-Teut. root sok-: sek-* to cut; cf. L. secāre to cut.]

1. A cutting tool consisting of a plate (or, in some forms, a band or a tube) of metal (usually steel), one edge of which is formed into a continuous series of teeth. (Some saws for cutting stone are without teeth.) In the original form of the tool, represented by the HAND-SAW, and in some varieties of more modern invention, e.g. the pit-saw (see PIT *sb.*1 14), the saw is moved backwards and forwards, each movement in one direction deepening the groove or 'kerf' made in the wood or other material to be cut. In other varieties, as the circular saw and the band-saw, a continuous movement in one direction is substituted for the reciprocating movement.

Ordinarily saw means the complete instrument including the handle, frame, or the like, necessary to fit it for use; but sometimes the word is applied to the 'saw-plate' or 'saw-blade' alone.

Also with defining words, indicating special varieties of form, structure, mode of operation, or purpose, as in band saw, circular saw, compass saw, drag saw, endless saw, frame saw, fret saw, gate saw, hand saw, ice saw, joint saw, keyhole saw, lock saw, meat saw, mill saw, panel saw, pit saw, rabbet saw, rip saw, sash saw, tenon saw, web saw. These terms, so far as they have been thought to require notice in this Dictionary, are treated either under their first element or as main words. A considerable number of kinds of saws used for surgical purposes are distinguished by the names of their inventors, as Butcher's, Ferguson's, Gowan's, Hey's, Liston's saw.

Say (sē[1]), v.[1] Forms: see below. [OE. sęgan, pa. t. sægde, corresp. to OFris. sega, sedza (mod. Fris. sizze), OS. seggian, pa. t. sagda (MLG. seggen, MDu. seggen, sagen, Du. zeggen), OHG. sagēn, pa. t. sagita, segita (MHG., mod.G. sagen), ON. segja, pa. t. sagða; repr. OTeut. sagājan, sagjan :—pre-Teut. sokēi-. The root is perh. WIndo-germanic soq"- : seq"*, found in Lith. sakýti, OSl. sočyti tosay, Gr. ἔννεπε imper. (:—en-seq"e* = OLatin inseque, insece), ἐνισπεῖν aorist inf., to tell, say, L. inquam I say (:—in-squ-am*).

The normal mod.Eng. phonetic representative of the OE. inf. sęgan (or the 1st sing. pres. sęge) would have been sedge*. As in the case of Buy v., Lie v.[1], the mod. form comes from OE. forms which had g (palatal) instead of cg, as imp. sęg, sæge, 2nd sing. pres. ind. sęgest, sægst, 3rd sing. pres. ind. sęgeð, sægð. The g represents WGer. g, and the cg WGer. gg; the OTeut. stem sagj-* having become by phonetic law in W.Ger. saggj-* before an inflexional suffix beginning with a vowel, and sagi-* in any other position. In Middle English, alongside the tendency, which ultimately prevailed, to extend the stem seg-, sei-, sai- (:—OE. seg-) to all parts of the verb, there existed an opposite tendency to extend the stem segg- beyond its etymological limits. Hence most of the parts of the verb (though not the pa. t.) had two widely divergent forms, the distribution of which does not closely correspond to dialectal divisions. In some northern poetry the two forms occasionally occur in juxtaposition as distinct words (e.g. 'Tille I haue seggid and saide all my sawe', York Myst. xxxii. 16). In Robert of Brunne the form segge, sedge* (implied in sedgeyne) seems to be appropriated to the sense 'recite' (as a minstrel): see Sayer 1, Saying 1.]

B. Signification.

In Eng., as in other Teut. langs., say is an approximate synonym of speak, from which it differs in having normally as its object a particular word or series of words, or a sentence representing the meaning of a particular series of words. Cf. L. dicere and its representatives in Romanic (which, however, have also senses that are now expressed in Eng. by tell) and L. aio, inquam.

As the word designates not the action of speaking itself, but its relation to the object, its use with reference to written expression does not ordinarily, like the similar use of speak, involve any consciousness of metaphor.

1. trans. To utter or pronounce (a specified word or words, or an articulate sound). Also, in wider sense, used of an author or a book, with quoted words as object.

For various idiomatic collocations, as to say nay, to say ho, to say farewell, etc., see the conjoined words.

For as who saith, as who should say, see As and Who.

10. On the analogy of expressions like 'let us say', 'shall we say?', etc. (referable to senses 1–3), where the verb has contextually the sense of 'suppose', 'assume', the imperative say is idiomatically used: a. to introduce a clause, with the sense 'supposing', 'on the assumption that'; b. parenthetically, to indicate that a preceding sentence expresses a supposition or a selected instance; c. prefixed to a designation of number, quantity, date, etc. to mark it as an approximate guess or as representing a hypothetical case.

In commercial documents say is also used, without any implication of inexactness, to introduce any varied repetition of a numerical or quantitative statement: e. g., 'a shipment of 215 (say two hundred and fifteen) tons of coal'; 'thirteen stones (say 182 pounds)'; 'four editions of 2000 copies each, or say in all 8000 copies'. Cf. Ger. sage, Da. siger, Sw. säger; the two last are indicative present, either 1st or 3rd pers. sing.; Du. has zegge (old form of zeg, 1st pers.), and Fr. has je dis similarly used.

Sw. skabb, Da. skab from the 13th c.), corresponding to OE. sceabb SHAB sb., q.v. for cognate forms. With sense 4 cf. MDu. schabbe, applied to women with the senses 'slut' and 'scold'; possibly this word, used by foreign vagrants, may have helped the development of the sense in Eng.; its etymological relation to early mod.Du. schabbe (Kilian), Flem. dial. schab itch (= OE. sceabb) is not clear.

The occurrence of the word in Kentish of the 13th c. is a difficulty, as the Scandinavian form would be unlikely to be adopted in that dialect. Perh. the word may in this passage represent the OE. sceabb, with archaizing spelling due to the influence of the L. scabies, which it here renders (cf. Lev. xiii. 6, Vulgate). Association with the Latin word of similar sound has influenced the later medical use.]

Malmesb.*, Rolls Ser., I. 55), latinized eschauberca (an. 1204 in Rot. Chart. 134/1).

Evidence of the existence of the word in continental OF. has not yet been found, as J. de Garlandia, though resident in France, was an Englishman. The form represents an earlier scalberc, -berge*, which must be an adoption of a Teut. compound, the last element of which contains the root berg-* to protect (cf. Hauberk). No such Teut. compound has, however, been found. As to the origin of the first element two suggestions have been made: (1) that it is OHG. scala shell, husk, which does not yield a very satisfactory sense; (2) that scalberc* is altered by dissimilation from scarberc*, from OHG. scār, scāra, ordinarily meaning 'scissors', but occas. used as a designation for a sword. The Icel. skálp-r scabbard, skálm short sword (? a. Gr. σκάλμη), skálm 'one part of a cloven thing' (Vigf.), pl. bean-pods, have some resemblance in form and sense, but the possibility of etymological connexion is very doubtful.]

The specific use referring to liquid agency, which is the prominent use in Fr. (and hence in Eng.), and is more or less represented in the other Rom. langs., is prob. to be accounted for by the fact that excaldāre could as well be referred to the cal(i)da sb., hot water, as to the adj. In Eng. this is the earliest sense of the word, which is first recorded in the Ancren Riwle (a 1225) both in its simple form (see quot. s. v. Scalding ppl. a.) and in the compound forscal(e)alde (see For- pref.[1] 5).

The word entered at an early date into the Scandinavian languages: early MDa. skolde, MSw. skalda, skolda, skolla, Sw. skålla to scald.]

For the OE. scealu the inflexion appears to attest the short vowel in all the senses. The WGer. skâla* (:—OTeut. skēlā*, skalā) passed into OF. as eschale, escale cup (med.L. scala 'patera'), also husk (mod.F. écale). Between the first quarter of the 13th c. and the 16th c. the a forms (containing the vowel a) represent the northern pronunciation, the β forms being midland and southern. In the 16th c., however, the northern scale seems to have found its way into the London dialect, being used by Palsgrave and later by Spenser and Shaks. In the 17th c. scale is the prevailing literary form, though scole (with other equivalent spellings) occasionally appears down to the middle of the century.]
